man jumped head foremost from the Brooklyn Bridge at 2.20 o'clock this aftermoon and was apparently uninjured.

He had stepped out of a cab driven b lip Scholl, of 45 Chapel street, Brooklyn. and without warning dived over the parapet on the north side of the bridge, about one hunared feet west of the Brooklyn tower. The man struck the water within tairty yards of a harbor patrol boat, manned by l'atroimen Dalley, Horan and Tulley. As soon as the man rose to the surface the patrolmen fished him up into the boat. He

They then took him to the police station at Pier A, where, after he recovered consciousness, he said that his name was Daniel Mc. Laughlin, and that he had recently come to New York from Roanoke, Va. He also gave his age as thirty-five, and said he was a blacksmith by occupation.

There were no bruises on McLaughlin's body, but as he was faint, and had presumably received internal injuries, he was removed to the Coumbers Street Hospital. He had in his clothes a gold watch and chain and $65 in bills and small change. Scholl, the cabman, said to an Evening The man had engaged me to drive him to

New York. I noticed nothing unusual about him. He was very weil dressed; wore a lightcolored overcoat, dark trousers and a derb "Suddenly I became aware that the cab's door nearest the bridge parapet was swung open, and looking around I saw the man step out and, without saying a word, walk rapidly to the rais and then bound head foremost into "I think he must have intended to commi suicide. A professional bridge-jumper would bave taken off his coat."

The cabman was not arrested. Roundsman Brophy, of the Bridge squad,

In reference to the theory that the man is a professional bridge-jumper, there is some confirmation in a story told by cx-Bridge-Jumper steve Bredie, who was seen by an Evexiso World properter.

Brodie said that this morning three persons came into his place, one a short man, the others a medium-sized man with a clean shaven face and a boy.

They began to talk of bridge jumping and one said he was going to jump off this afternoof.

Brodie did not know which one it was, as he paid no attention to their talk, considering it to be more bluff than anything cise.
